

Abstract

Japan's Approach in the Field of Nuclear Disarmament and the United Nations

KATARAO Haruka (Peace Promotion Advisor, Hiroshima Prefectural Government)

This article outlines the Japan's approach at the UN General Assembly First Committee in the past and also the implications for the future. It then explores how Japan's foreign policy has developed in the international political arena during and after the cold war, followed by a look at the UN perspective of the landmark documents. Following the examination of the international disarmament trend and the nexus of Japan's foreign policy, this article focuses on its achievements, challenges and perspectives from the view point of Japan's foreign policy in the field of nuclear disarmament and the United Nations.
